Debates over the maximum betting amount for gambling machine offerings are drawing to a close in the United Kingdom. Many gambling operators are already feeling the pinch from the crackdown on fixed odds betting terminals (FOBTs). Currently, lawmakers in the UK are discussing lowering the max bet from £100 (±AU$184) to an amount between £50 (±AU$95) and £2 (±AU$4). Speculation by various experts estimates that the amount will be closer to £2 if anti-gambling representatives get their way. On the other hand, individuals who want to make wagers on any sporting event are likely to be able to do so, legal or not. While leagues may have a difficult time monitoring betting now, it would only be harder if these wagers were being made with local bookies rather than with licensed bookmakers either online or at shops. In addition, allowing these bets to be made legally provides much more of a record should suspicious betting take place; investigators can then look into wagering patterns in an attempt to discover whether any illegal activities were taking place.
