Pretty much the entire Bitcoin community wanted to increase the network's capacity to handle more transactions. This is because the cost of transactions had increased to a point that the network was unusable for small transactions. Every transaction on the network pays a fee to the miners to incentivise them to secure the network. If there are too many transactions occurring, there is a backlog of transactions and they essentially queue in what is known as a memepool. The miners automatically choose the transactions with the largest fees attached to validate first. This creates a race to the top in terms of the cost of fees. Fees on the Bitcoin network reached levels of $40-$50 in the spring of 2017 – obviously, this is unacceptable. australia tourism board
